Q: Are there any possible tax implications of writing a book using a pseudonym? The scenario is simple. I write a book, and I want to do some interesting things with the chapter headings so I hide the chapter headings with a fancy cover letter thing with fancy formatting tricks. (for example if the chapters are "A very short chapter title" "A chapter title that exceeds the 500 character limit" and "A longer chapter title"), would this be considered fake/unofficial printing/bookkeeping, or is it considered fine? If it is seen as fine, do you think it would be a good idea to start using a username that I use for all my social media accounts as the author of the book? I've noticed that if I tweet/facebook/reddit something under my own name, it's posted as me - however if I use my pseudonym, it's posted as a bot. A: The author of a book is the author of the book. The author of a work of fiction is the author of the work of fiction. The author of a work of non-fiction is the author of the work of non-fiction. If you do not want to use your name, or want to be attributed to as a pseudonym, there are better options than what you are proposing. A: If you publish under the name that you use on social media, then anyone will assume that's you, unless you do something else to set yourself apart from that persona. If you avoid using that name for social media, then that seems fairly obvious that it's not you. I imagine the only confusion would be if you don't use that name for everything, but just for one thing, like for professional purposes. In that case, that would seem somewhat suspicious because there wouldn't be a reasonable explanation for it. That aside, it's hard to think of any legal things that could happen to you. As far as the book itself, that seems fine, although one might expect that if you hide the names of the chapters, you'd want to use a series of numbers instead. A: You could get into some trouble. There are rules for how to cite in quotations from other people's books. If you refer to someone else's work without citing them, then in principle the publisher could take you to court. The rules in the UK can be found here:

Q: Reading parameter from url in another class in C# I have a very simple class in a webforms application (in C#):

public class ValuesAndTexts { public const string Descriptions = "Descriptions"; public const string Quantities = "Quantities"; public const string Values = "Values"; public static void Main(string[] args) { string[] commandTokens = args.Split(','); if (commandTokens.Length!= 3) { throw new InvalidOperationException("Not enough parameters"); } string action = commandTokens[0]; string description = commandTokens[1]; string quantity = commandTokens[2]; /* *... */ } }
```

When the user clicks a button, the method Main is called, and it takes the user's input and adds it to the class.

string[] commandTokens = args.Split(','); if (commandTokens.Length!= 3) { throw new InvalidOperationException("Not enough parameters"); } string action = commandTokens[0]; string description = commandTokens[1]; string quantity = commandTokens[2];

Now I need to write the class above to a new method. I've tried many different things, but I'm stumped. Any ideas?
A: You should create a new instance of ValuesAndTexts class in the consuming methods of your program.

string[] commandTokens = args.Split(','); if (commandTokens.Length!= 3) { throw new InvalidOperationException("Not enough parameters"); } string action = commandTokens[0]; string description = commandTokens[1]; string quantity = commandTokens[2]; var instance = new ValuesAndTexts(); instance.action = action; instance.description = description; instance
