The clinical evaluation of hip disorders often has yielded equivocal results, leading to the exploration of other diagnostic procedures. In our experience, computerized tomography arthrography has proved a valuable tool in the management of patients with suspected hip disease. Plain film, tomography, and conventional arthrography followed by a surgeon's evaluation of hip motion, which had not demonstrated any hip pathology, led us to believe that the hip joint could be anatomically normal. This "false negative" finding on the plain film led us to perform computerized tomography arthrography on these patients. Computerized tomography arthrography allowed for a detailed evaluation of the anatomy of the hip joint in all nine patients. The images obtained clearly showed the periarticular soft tissues and bones as well as the internal derangement in all patients. We conclude that computerized tomography arthrography is a rapid and reliable diagnostic procedure in patients with suspected hip pathology. It provides an excellent evaluation of soft tissues in the hip and can be used as a guide to hip surgery. Denny, Please, let me know if it's OK to sign it with only a fax.
