Healthy Habits Tracker is a complete and organized tool for collecting and analyzing data, reminding you of new goals, and supporting you in reaching those goals. It supports iOS 6 and requires 64-bit processors. The long range goal of this project is to gain an understanding of the relationship between the structure of phosphatidylinositol and its lipid-transfer protein (LTP) and its interactions with bilayer-forming phospholipids. LTP interacts specifically and nonspecifically with lipids in various membrane systems. The specific aims are: (1) Isolation and characterization of the LTP from beef liver, (2) Characterization of the LTP structure by circular dichroism and infrared spectroscopy, (3) Characterization of the structure of phosphatidylinositol and phosphatidylcholine in the presence and absence of LTP, (4) Characterization of the effects of LTP on membrane permeability. Muscle glycogen content and contractile properties in human exercise. Muscle glycogen content and biochemical and mechanical properties of muscle were measured in 40 subjects before and after a single bout of exhaustive exercise, of which 14 were very fit (peak O₂ consumption 4.3 to 5.5 l/min) and 26 were less fit (peak O₂ consumption 2.6 to 3.5 l/min). In all subjects glycogen content fell after exercise and remained reduced for at least 48 h. The fastest cyclists showed the largest reduction (44%) and the most delayed recovery (9 h). Peak O₂ consumption was unrelated to glycogen loss, while maximal voluntary isometric force was depleted to approximately 38% of initial value and recovered slowly. It is concluded that human muscle glycogen content correlates with the capacity for high aerobic metabolism and with resistance to fatigue induced by strenuous, non-weight-bearing exercise. Glycogen loss is not a limiting factor to maximal voluntary isometric force, since voluntary activity does not fully utilize ATP in muscle. The rapid depletion of glycogen and slow recovery of muscle contractile properties after anaerobic exercise may limit the contribution of muscle glycogen to endurance performance.
